

Deaf Japanese Students Rejected by Oregon

There were a dozen or more deaf Japanese youths in Oregon who were taken to relocation centers along with other Japs. These young people had never attended the State school at Salem. After being moved to their new homes, they suddenly wanted to attend the Salem School. Their request was denied by the board of control. Superintendent Marvin Clatterbuck was opposed to admitting these students, but sympathically suggested the government provide classes for them within the relocation centers.